Albert S. Perrin, 64, a butcher living in the village of Brooklyn, was found dead in his wagon, with his back broken, in the front yard at his home at about 1 o'clock Sunday morning. Mr. Perrin had been spending Saturday evoning in Danielson. Just how he came to meet with the injury that caused his death was uncertain, but the belief is that the horse may have started suddenly at some point on the highway between Danielson and Brooklyn, throwing Mr. Perrin backward toward the body of the express wagon in which he was riding. Nothing had developed Sunday to indicate wagon in which he was riding. Nothing had developed Sunday to indicate that he met with foul play.
